Attendance at general practices in Edinburgh, Scotland: Comparison of core and provisional indicators. To quantify attendance at general practices (GPs) in Edinburgh, Scotland, from their own routine data, and to compare the performance of core and provisional attendance indicators. Data from five practices were collected and the practices were classified based on population health status using socio-economic deprivation (SIMD) score, general practitioner (GP) registration data, the percentage of patients registered at a practice with a long-standing illness, smoking rate, and general practice commissioning category. Data collection involved all practice staff and patients recorded during March and April 2014 using standardised forms. A total of 1,057 patient contacts were recorded over a 24-h period. There were 667 (64%) patients recorded as having an appointment, and 461 (45%) were recorded as being seen. When appointment frequency was included as an appointment indicator, the proportion of patients having at least one appointment in any 24-h period was 70% compared with 59% when a clinic visit indicator was used. The proportion of contacts recorded as patient-initiated was 8% compared with 7%. The mean number of appointments recorded by practice was 2.7 (SD 1.3). Maximum appointment frequency was recorded in one practice for 5.8% of patients. The proportion of patients with a long-standing illness was 100% for one practice, but no proportion was recorded for the other four practices. There was no evidence of a difference between the practices in terms of appointment indicator performance. The prevalence of attendance in this study was high, however the data collection methods have a high potential for introducing bias. The use of appointment data to measure attendance is potentially useful in estimating the proportion of patients attending. the adult **cmv-sncn1**-deficient mice.
